7. Estimated annual cost to comply with the proposed action to:

A private person: The current regulations require a new hire have a psychological exam only when it is determined to be necessary. The amended regulation would require a psychological exam for every new hire. The exam is paid for either by the municipality or the applicant. According to APSC records, the base cost of psychological exam varies from $350 to $700. This does not take into account any travel costs to get an applicant to the location of the exam.

Another state agency: The current regulations require a new hire have a psychological exam only when it is determined to be necessary. The amended regulation would require a psychological exam for every new hire. There are three state agencies affected by these regulations: Department of Public Safety (Alaska State Troopers and Alaska Wildlife Troopers), Department of Transportation (Airport police officers) and the University of Alaska (University police officers). All three agencies currently require all applicants/new hires to have a psychological exam and the agencies pay for the exam. This regulation would not change their current practice. According to APSC records, the base cost of psychological exam varies from $350 to $700. This does not take into account any travel costs to get an applicant to the location of the exam.

A municipality: The current regulations require a new hire have a psychological exam only when it is determined to be necessary. The amended regulation would require a psychological exam for every new hire. While some municipalities already require a psychological exam for their new hires, some municipalities do not; thus this amended regulation would affect some municipalities. The exam is paid for either by the municipality or the applicant. According to APSC records, the base cost of psychological exam varies from $350 to $700. This does not take into account any travel costs for rural communities to get an applicant to the location of the exam.
